

It was isolated, it was a desert, everything was costly; how to accomplish what had to be done with the means at hand was the greatest problem. But it was solved.

Another class was studying the alphabet which nature had embossed upon the rocks, setting the letters to words and from them studying out the record of what was hidden in the hills. Every height was climbed, every fastness of mountain and desert explored.

They spread to other territories and gave mining in them a new direction.

They did more to reduce mining and the treatment of ores to an exact science than had been done in the old world through all the rolling ages.

They were superior intellectually to any race of men that ever before caused a state to round into form. That is, they averaged higher and they did things and did them right. Even the toughs among them never shot the wrong man, and the swear words of those who engineered mules and oxen had a rhythm, a euphony, and power of expression never attained by any other race. This perfectness was general. For instance, if mining was reduced to nearly an exact science, stage driving was reduced to a fine art, and here in Washoe county Colonel Johnson had an imagination which made all previous works of fiction seem insipid and tame.

with stars among those pioneers.

All the intellectual sky of Nevada was filled. They soon made for Nevada, a name which arrested the world's attention and the territory became the concernment of all the world's financial centers.

Their work soon placed the United States upon a new financial basis, and Nevada's gold and silver steadied the Republic through the labor, the anguish, and the fear of her second birth.

This is history. Nevada has another history that cannot be set to words.

There were charities noiselessly bestowed, which made the angel of mercy weep for joy. There were deeds of self-abnegation performed which no rewards of this world could make restitution for.

Many a heart, too, broke in silence, making no sign.

In many a soul Hope died when the enchantment of the light that had led them on went out.

It was not long until here and there a grave began to appear.

As the years went on these graves became more frequent, on mountain top, on the desert—everywhere, until now when the long roll of those names is called the answers are the exceptions.

I was recently in an ancient place and the names of many of the monuments had grown so dim that it was difficult to decipher them.

But in the burial places of memory the names of many of your pioneers will never grow dim, rather they will grow more and more distinct. As their sun set, the refraction of their lives, shining back, with their bended rays, still fills Nevada's sky with light.

As time goes on a halo will gather around them which will magnify them and reveal them in a softer, clearer light.

All the honors we can pay them are deserved; no tribute that we can offer them will portray adequately their work or fill the measure of their worth. All honor to them, all honor to the living, and to those who have fallen asleep, all peace.
